

Tips from our successful Sixth Form students

“I really find it useful to look back in my book at past questions I have completed. I know that in history every homework assignment could be an actual question. The pink bits show when I have wrote something really well –good enough to include in the real exam. Where I see green then I know I need to improve the content and the way I have structured the sentence”.

(George Storey)

“I believe the structure we use in Geography is really useful as it gives you clear steps to follow so you know you're hitting all the criteria needed in the mark scheme, this also helps to speed up your writing. The timings in Geography are quite harsh. It's really important to practise writing under pressure because you need to make sure you can fit in all the knowledge you've learnt in a short space of time.”

(Matt Slack)

“I personally make my own revision summary books for each topic a while before the exam. Then closer to the exam I copy these up into revision posters and have these on my walls. The night before the exam I always highlight my notes and read them back to myself”

(Natasha Martin)

“For my GCSE revision, I did multiple mock test papers.....I structured my revision so that after each test paper I sat, I had a break.”

(George Atkin -Hill)

“I would test myself on the content from my revision guide and class workbook. I would mark the test, identify the areas I was weakest on and then test myself again”

(Lydia Woolley)

“Prioritise the areas where you know your knowledge is the weakest and learn the key points from the mark schemes. Revision does not have to be a long and boring process”
